

Opportunities for future work

We recognize that the results of the current analysis represent a preliminary observation of the limitations inherent in such a large record. In addition to the limitations of using large survey data sets discussed earlier, this study is also constrained by budget. Our data sources focus on supermarkets and takeout platforms with many customers, thus ignoring the universality of the data. However, our data seem to support the argument that the Liberal Party should make economic development and the improvement of people's living standards as its main objectives. Therefore, our future work will focus on understanding and surveying the suburbs of the sparsely populated Yukon province. Research shows that education levels in remote Yukon areas lag far behind those in other Canadian regions, yet indigenous people here make up about a quarter of the province's population⁶. So, researching and understanding the political will of the indigenous people will largely determine the outcome of the Liberal election.
